Excerpt: . chapter xii does it payp The preceding chapters tell the story of the various forms of industrial betterment undertaken by industrialists employing all the way from 5 up to 210.000 Lktsnh. At this point I desire to supplement the working cpxperience in factory, mill and workshop by the testimony of typical industrialists stating their attitude toward industrial betterment. This study shows that in nny great movement extending over a territory so vast as the United States, and dealing with such a complexity of nationalities, hK-al conditions and kt soual prejudices of both capital and labor, the failures have been comparatively few; it tells the story of the way in which the various forms of mutuality have lessened the elemental friction between the employer and the employed. The fact that employers of upwards of one and a half million people who have come within the scope of this study are carrying on some form of betterment, is an evidence that they are not throwing their money away; in other words, they consider it good business. Apart from the mere commercial, there are other motives characterizing the industrial relations of to-day. As Carroll D. Wright observes: The rich and powerful employer, with the adjuncts of education and great business training, holds in his influence something more than the means of a subsistence for those he employs; he holds their moral well-being in his keeping, in so far as it is in his power to hold...
