Excerpt: . . . from July, 1911, to October, 1914, and moved the school from California to Fort Sill, Okla. When troops were concentrated at Galveston, a battalion of the 19th Infantry, on duty at the school, was ordered to Galveston, and Col. Miller was detailed to Galveston to command the base and port of embarkation. He was detailed to foreign service, going to Europe, where he visited the musketry schools of France, Germany, Switzerland and England. He observed the operations of these schools and embodied his observations in a special report to the War Department. He also attended the autumn parade in Berlin, on September 4, 1913, and attended the Kaiser maneuvers. Now that the various state legislatures have settled down to winter business, sportsmen, marksmen, pistol and rifle enthusiasts of the country may expect the advocate of legislation to regulate the possession of firearms by citizens, to be actively in evidence. Proper regulations are not only to be advocated but are necessary. It is right that a dealer should be required to report his sales to the police of the city in which he is doing business. Such a policy enables the central detective office to trace the ownership of weapons used in the commission of crimes. But to attempt to wipe murder and suicide from civic annals by curtailing the privileges of citizens to own firearms is as mistaken an idea as it is a foolish one; and it usually results in a total disarming of the citizen,...
