The ears of belladonna pain more than they itch; the ears of agaricus itch more than they pain; the ears of borax resemble the others in their inflammatory discharges, hardness of hearing, crackling, stopped sensations and roaring noises, but have no itching nor over-sensitiveness to sound, as the others have. The facial redness, heat, swelling and pallor are alike in all, but in belladonna they change more rapidly, and attain a greater heat. In the mouth and throat belladonna has no actual lesions of the lining, as borax has, with their elongated form, yellow pus and offensive odor, but the spasmodic element in belladonna is foremost, even imitating that of hydrophobia, but most usually with dryness. Agaricus has neither actual lesion nor marked swelling, but a copious saliva of all sorts of bad taste, while the nose seems as if stopped with cotton, and solid balls of phlegm are hawked easily from the throat, as in the commencement of certain colds. In belladonna colds, the throat suffers most; in borax colds the nose ulcerates inside and out; in agaricus colds it feels as if stopped by cotton wool. The mucous membrane of the belladonna case is mostly hot and dry; of the borax case moist, eroded, and offensive; that of agaricus feels astringed, and tastes badly. The stomach of belladonna is affected with few but violent symptoms, mostly referable to the nervous system; strong cravings and sudden vomitings, violent pain as if neuralgia; the borax...
