These objects concern three classes - ourselves, the students-at-law, and the public. They aim to help us to be honest, and to be brethren; to make the young fit to be lawyers; and to secure for society just laws, and their just administration. The first of these objects, which concerns ourselves, proposes to each of us personal elevation of character, and to all of us the stimulus which comes of association. It is not only the first in the order of enunciation, and the first in importance, but it draws the others after it. A Bar which is possessed of high moral character, relieved at the same time by generous social qualities, will, by the force of its example, compel abundant preparation from those who seek its membership, will advance the Law with the advancing needs of the times, and enforce from the Magistracy the full measure of its duty.
