Most creameries, when they rebuild, or new ones starting pay some attention nowadays, to looks as well as utility. This pays in the long run, because an up to date creamery building, set in attractive surroundings, exercises an influence all down the line. The patron gets an object lesson in neatness and beautiful surroundings, and the creamery management and buttermaker try to live up to their environment The good work goes on, and better butter and better patrons is the result. These few remarks were called forth at this time by seeing a photograph of the new Glencoe Creamery, of Glencoe, Minn., which shows a modern creamery building with a little landscape gardening, the whole effect being very desirable, and will do much to encourage...
